Manus, the control of liest days of Christianity in Ireland un-til two centuries ago, Lough Dears was a famed place of pilgrimage in Europe. St. Patrick discovered that the lake was retired, and would be a good place for penance, and he retired sev-eral times to a cave on the island in the lake and spent forty days in prayer and fasting. Subsequently a monastery was built on the island, and after two centuries destroyed by the Danes. If was built on the island, and after two centuries destroyed by the Danes. It was rebuilt in the twelfth century by the Augusthians and flourished until the eighteenth century. The foreign fame of the Lough began about the eleventh century. The chief reason for the spread of its tame through Europe was the record of the pligrimage of an Irish knight, who, on his return from the Crimade with Stephen, wrote a work which had a great influence upon the literature of Europe. The Tuam Herald of March 14 con-The Tuam Herald of March 1st contained the following: "Recently we have had the pleasure of listening to some of the most ancient and perfect of Gaelic legends in the vernacular from the lips of Mr. Patrick O. Hession of Clough, Corofin, in this county, Mr. Hession is 84 years of age and well preserved, and dresses in the garb of the Gael. He can sing you an ancient Irish romance in a manner which the Irish romance in a manner which the Troubadour might envy, eyes bright with the moving tale of battlefield, or moist with the melting tale of love, and gestures various and appropriate. and gestures various and appropriate. Certainly it was a happiness to meet with this precious link with the past; and an esteemed companion—the best Gaelic scholar in Ireland—assures the writer that he would remain in Mr. Hession's company for hours upon hours to listen to the rhythmic rolling syllables of the lore and the lyrics that rolled trippingly from his tongue. Mr. Hession appears to be a perfect thesaurus of the legendary poetry of Ireland; and we trust that his days may be long in the land—not alone for their sake, but his own."
